CHAPTER 1: AN INTRODUCTION TO GENDER

Bourdieu, a French sociologist, notes that gender can be thought of as the intersection of social and cultural factors and how these factors are internalized by individuals. He argues that gender is not something that is external to the individual, but rather that it is constructed through social interactions. This means that gender is not a fixed characteristic that is inherent to a person, but rather that it is something that is learned and developed through socialization. Gender is thus a complex and dynamic process, and it is important to consider the various factors that influence gender roles and identities.
